In the early 21st century, migration has certainly become a major topic in academic as much as in political debate. While the phenomenon allows interrelating numerous issues and fundamental questions, the rather technical search for so-called 'root causes' and 'sustainable solutions' and its inherent perpetuation of crisis and presentism has prevailed much of our academic debate.

Taking the Horn of Africa and its long and ongoing history of migration as a starting point, our workshop aims at a broader understanding of asymmetric global relations, the empirical study of necessary contexts, and the discussion of advanced theoretical frames and models.
